HIS BROTHER'S KEEPER

Synopsis of Chapters Already Published Mark and Hugh Lee, two brothers, lov lda Graves, daughter of their employe:

CHAPTER XV.

ITH the crack like the repor of a pistol the taut rope snapped. Up shot the bal-sideways. With no stationary point whereby to take bearings there was no possible way of determining motion. It was a unique, uncanny sensation.

Cooped up in the ill-smelling darkness of Mattnew's cart, I had been no more ignorant as to my direction. It was as though mother earth had tast me from her and I was plunging—whither heaven alone knew. I was no more of earth, no more mortal, but a nameless, directionless atom, driven through sky space at the whim of the lour winds.

And I gripped the narrow seat and through sky space at the wilm of the four winds.

And I gripped the narrow seat and fought for self-control, fought against the awful senseless panic that was seeking to overthrow my whirling reason and lure me to throw myself madly from the swaying side of the car into space, with a mad longing to get back to earth again. If these thoughts of mine sound more like the ravings of a disordered brain than the raschings of a normal, grown man, I can only say—let the man judge me who bus been in like plight, and who has kep' a calmly balanced mind throughout.

But I for ght and won. I drove from he the unreasening fear, the craving of throw myself back upon mother arth. And, bit by bit, I forced myself o become normal.

A scrap of newspaper that had been ring among the blanket folds became islodged by a sudden motion of my ody, It fell upon the ledge of the car, uttered outward and simply vanished. It did not flutter out into space, but isappeared as thoroughly as if snatched y some invisible hand.

The phenomenon puzzled me. I picked n a larger bit of newspaper, tore anther fragment from it and rested it n the ledge. Again the same lightning isappearance. It was not until the ourth experiment that I realized the ause; So rapidly was the balloon chirling upward that the instant the apper fell over the side we flew far love it. Colder grew the air. Colder and daz-alove it.

Colder grew the air. Colder and dazlingly clear. Then, all in an instant, everything was obscured in an onrush of gray, drenching impenetrable mist.

I battled for mere breath in the cold, wet, stifling murk. I wendered if—
In a trice we were out of it and in colder, even more brilliantly lear air
again, the sun pouring down upon me
and turning the balloon's yellow silken shape into a sphere of shimmering
gold.

gold.

Then I understood. We had passed straight through a cloud. I summoned courage to look over the side asain. Earth had quite disappeared. Directly below me lay a gray, lowering bank of mist selow me lay a gray, lowering bank of nist.

I was literally "above the clouds."

Whether I was a mile above earth or two or three miles I do not yet know. But I remembered having read somewhere that after reaching a certain height it becomes impossible for mortals to breathe.

And already, whether from real cause or from overstimulated imagination, any breath came shorter and there was a tightening band about my chest.

I looked about me, seeking for some means whereby to guide or trammel this huge aerial monster which was whirling me momentarily higher.
